Friday brief: getting ULS to 50–100 bags a month

For Prince only. Talking points for the meeting with Ronnie on Friday 13/11/2026. Anything marked (assumption) is my estimate, not a fact. Ronnie's answers replace it.

The one-line pitch

"Google is already sending you calls. I'll turn that trickle into a system: we count every enquiry, win a handful of landscapers who reorder, sell soil and pebbles to your Urban Pots customers, and follow up every quote. You'll see the bag count on one page each month."

Where things stand (facts)

- Bag orders so far: 0. A few phone enquiries, all from people who found the site on Google.
- Google sends the site about 64 visits a month (191 clicks over the last 3 months, Search Console).
- People who search his name find him (position 2). People searching "landscaping supplies Sydney" don't yet (page 3 to 5).
- His Google listing is strong: 4.9 stars, 67 reviews, shared with Urban Pots.
- Done this week: 80+ page titles and descriptions rewritten around real searches, two bugs fixed that were hiding pages from Google, review stars corrected. From Friday the site also counts taps on his phone number, which it didn't before.

The maths to 50 bags

50 bags a month is about 12 a week. Two kinds of buyer get him there very differently.

Buyer	Bags per order (assumption)	Orders needed for 50 bags	Enquiries needed if 1 in 3 buys (assumption)
Homeowners only	1–2	25–50	75–150 a month
Landscapers who reorder	4–6 a month each	8–12 regular customers	about 30 conversations, once

What this means:

- Free Google search alone won't reach 50 soon. 64 visits a month cannot produce 75–150 enquiries. Search is the slow engine: worth building, but it pays off over months.
- Ten regular landscapers is most of the goal. That is a list and some phone calls, not a marketing campaign.
- Bag count isn't the same as money. A pebble bag sells for $800–$1,100; soil and mulch sell for $128–$178. One pebble bag brings in as much as 6 soil bags. Pebble pages already get most of the product clicks. Ask which he actually makes money on.

The three free moves

1. Trade customers. I'm building a list of landscapers and turf layers within about 20 km of the yard. Ronnie (or I, with his okay) contacts them with a simple first-order offer. The site already takes trade applications.
2. Urban Pots customers. Everyone who bought a pot needs soil, and many want pebbles on top. One message to that list. He already owns this audience.
3. Follow up every quote. Delivery is quoted per job, so every enquiry becomes a quote, and quotes that get no follow-up die. This is the system I build for trades. ULS would be the first one running.

Search and the Google listing keep growing in the background (Northern Beaches pages, turf underlay, Wetherill Park).

Targets to agree on

- First paid bag order within 14 days.
- 25 bags in a calendar month by day 60.
- 50 bags in a calendar month by day 90.

Judged on his own order records, not on rankings. If we miss, we'll both see the real number and why.

Questions only Ronnie can answer

The numbers

1. What does a bag cost him, and what's left after delivery? Which products make the most?
2. How many enquiries has he had so far, and what happened to each? (No reply, too dear, delivery too far, still deciding?)
3. How many bags could he deliver in a week right now? Who delivers, and what does a run cost him?
4. Does he want 50 bags, or does he want a profit number? (If margin is thin on soil, 20 pebble bags may beat 50 soil bags.)

The audience

5. How many Urban Pots customers does he have contact details for? Is he happy to message them about ULS?
6. Does he already know landscapers or builders who buy from someone else? Who do they buy from, and why?
7. What can he offer trade customers: a first-order price, free delivery over a certain number of bags, an account?

Google

8. His Google listing covers both businesses. Which website does its button open? Should ULS have its own listing?
9. Will he ask every customer for a Google review? I'll give him a one-line text to send.
10. If he runs ads himself, can we agree which pages they point to, so we can measure them?

Delivery facts for the site

11. Does he really deliver to the Northern Beaches and Eastern Suburbs, and how fast? Those pages get the most Google impressions, so the promise has to be true.

Two things to raise carefully

- A claim on the FAQ page isn't true yet. It says "we regularly supply large landscaping projects, developers and councils". With no orders so far, that should be reworded before it causes trouble. I'll fix it on his say-so.
- The Wetherill Park page claims "the lowest delivery fees in Sydney". Same issue unless he can back it up.

What I need from him to start

- A yes to the three moves and the targets.
- Answers to questions 1–3 (even rough ones).
- The okay to draft the Urban Pots customer message and the trade offer for him to review.
- A simple way to log enquiries. A shared note or sheet is enough to begin: date, what they wanted, quoted or not, bought or not.

What's in it for Prince (keep this to yourself in the room)

- A measured before-and-after: 0 bags to whatever we reach, with his order records as proof.
- The first live quote follow-up system, which is the one offer PAKS sells.
- A fair time to reopen the retainer is after the first month with real orders, not on Friday.
